Be humble.
But no everywhere?

I invested too much time into prior presentations, that I'm completely exhausted writing this presentation and I have other priorities on work right now.

Still I'm highly interested in the subject of being humble, you'll see.

So at least make it fun.

A challenge (rules) for this presentation:

- Everything I write once to completion stays in the presentation.
- I can refactor but not delete.
- It's only fun if I obey to these rules. (So I will do it, trust me). I did it as good as I could…
- Create a presentation that is underwhelming.
- NOT MANY PICTURES (yes I refactored, I wanted to do no pictures and I didn't manage)
- BREAK ALL THE RULES

/ˈhʌmb(ə)l/

adjective

1. having or showing a modest or low estimate of one's importance.
   "I felt very humble when meeting her"

   Similar: meek   deferential   respectful   submissive   self-effacing   unassertive   ⌄

2. of low social, administrative, or political rank.
   "she came from a humble, unprivileged background"

   Similar: low-ranking   low   lowly   lower-class   plebeian   proletarian   ⌄

perfectionism

/pəˈfɛkʃ(ə)nɪz(ə)m/

noun

refusal to accept any standard short of perfection.

But you are important.

And I'm important, what is this about being humble…

It seems to me that it is literally demeaning.

Maybe it has to do with dealing with feedback?

humble

Opposite

adjective

1. proud   overbearing

2. noble

Roasting (v.) - To humorously mock or humiliate someone with a well-timed joke, diss or comeback.

Who knows reddit?

There is a subreddit called roastme…

As I have a problem with perfectionism and not being humble sometimes (I think these two go very well hand in hand). I submitted a photo to at least get a little bit more humble in one way.

33m, am afraid of criticism, perfectionist. make it hurt.

His impersonation of the girl locked in his basement.

For some things it's good if they are almost perfect.

For other things it's good if they are good enough.

For even more things it's good if they are done.

This presentation belongs in the last section.

Your time has much more worth, than listening to this presentation.

Your Time is absolutely priceless…

You shouldn't be humble with your time, you need to hold it close to your heart.

So am I humble here?

Yes.

-> I take care of my time using the least amount of time to prepare for this presentation, and I don't pretend to be the best presentation guy that ever existed. It's not about that it's about AUTHENTIC COMMUNICATION.

I'm not putting myself on a pedestal telling you something that I just read about, meanwhile somebody else could tell you that very same thing just in a better way. (this was the thing with antifragility, I just found it interesting to learn about it). - (CURIOSITY)

What about you?

How much time did you invest into your presentation?

Are you happy with how much you invested?

Is less time better if you really like to learn about something and understand every bit of it?

IT'S ABOUT BALANCE

Remember: I invested too much time into prior presentations, that I'm completely exhausted writing this presentation and I have other priorities on work right now.

What makes up a good presentation? (my opinion)

- Personality (authentic)
- Balance (of everything, the outcome and the time invested)
- Curiosity (your interest for the topic)

- Handing over knowledge.

We have so many bright minds
-> let's have a discussion about when to be humble and when not to be humble.

Think about, talking with a client.

Think about, talking as the boss.

Think about, presenting a presentation.

Think about, talking in a group of strangers.

Think about, talking in a safe and trusted environment of coders.

Think about, having an interview for the job you want.

Not everywhere is a safespace.

You can get hurt by asking questions.

You know that since school.
